

Homelessness

Homelessness is a big problem. It affects millions in America. We can help them. The government could make big apartment buildings – about three to ten stories high – and let the homeless people occupy the buildings. We could house tens of thousands of homeless people like this. The government could also offer them jobs that don't require a high level of skill, like sanitary crews. We can reduce homelessness by increasing the amount of homes being constructed, which would provide both jobs and homes for homeless people. We can also prevent it by making sure to protect industries like the automotive or construction industry. We should try to prevent it.
